The liberal democracy crisis and the future of the EU

Liberal Europe under pressure

The British referendum vote against the EU, Donald Trump's victory in the USA, right-wing national governments in Hungary and Poland, strong right-wing populist and also left-wing populist movements across Europe: an increasing number of citizens are deciding against established politics and against Europe - at least against the European Union as we know it today.

Whilst left-wing globalization critics denounce the EU as a "neoliberal cartel", right-wing populists are standing up to the transfer of sovereignty from the national to the European level. They swear by the national community and challenge the liberal canon of values for which the EU stands: checks and balances, minority rights and universalist human rights.

Europe's cohesion and ability to act are under threat. The European Union is divided on many issues. By not bravely tackling the major challenges, such as unemployment and economic stagnation, the financial crisis or refugee policy, it is further stoking its crisis of legitimacy.

Why do we need a common Europe?

Sixty years after the signing of the Treaties of Rome, Europe must once again pull together, turn the crisis into an opportunity and defend its liberal democracy model. There is much to lose: peace and security, the freedom of movement and political freedoms, for which Europeans have fought for centuries.

The European Union must provide credible responses – in areas where Europe can achieve more through a common stance: a strong value-based foreign and security policy, a sustainable economic and infrastructure policy, an innovation-friendly climate and energy policy, a refugee and asylum policy that measures up to the current challenges. The EU must, in future, continue to be a guarantor for prosperity, peace and freedom.

Through this conference, we want to examine the question of how Europe can defend its liberal values, reach a new fundamental consensus, revitalize the spirit of cooperation and solidarity, and strengthen its ability to act.
