

EUROPEAN DEMOCRACY: WHAT ARE THE NEXT CHALLENGES?

June 26th 2017 – Room 4325 (3rd floor) 33, rue Saint-Dominique – 75007 Paris

The "democratic deficit" of the European Union is a hackney catch all term well known to the disdainers and skeptics of the European construction and as well to some promoters of more transparent and participatory EU, partisans of direct elections for all institutions or of simplification relations between institutions.

At a time when the democratic fracture between the EU and its peoples is being denounced as one of the main factors in the breakdown of the European project, it is necessary to shed full light on the debates surrounding many of the democratic features of this hybrid construction, which sometimes struggles to be described as representative of and listening to its citizens.

Would the EU be more democratic with a directly elected European Commission President? Should the right of legislative initiative be expanded? How can we take into account the results of national referenda without denying democracy in the neighboring countries? Can intergovernmental methods be democratic? How can citizens be empowered to participate in a more democratic construction of the EU ? Does the democratic divide exist only between "Brussels" and the populations, or between the Europeans themselves?

As part of the project "More Europe to overcome the crisis", the Jacques Delors Institute, in partnership with Toute l'Europe, the Sant'Anna College of Pisa, the University Institute for European Studies in Madrid, the Faculty of Lisbon NOVA and the University of Warsaw, is organizing a day of debate in order to provide constructive insights into these issues and draw concrete proposals for improvement.
